The Department of Computer Information Systems offers several graduate courses in the areas of computer information systems (CIS) and quantitative business analysis. These courses are designed to provide students with the knowledge and skills needed to ameliorate their business education and prepare them for highly competitive business environments. The CIS emphasis enables master of business administration (M.B.A.) students to meet the technological challenges facing new and old business enterprises and to develop new paradigms to leverage technology solutions in developing new business strategies that lead to achieving a competitive advantage in the market place. Course topics include Web-based applications and e-commerce, enterprise planning and process re-engineering, networks and administration, management database applications and systems simulation.
